Other forms Cast-iron hearths are also used in fireplaces for fireplaces designed to provide heating for a room rather than a fire in the fireplace. These are usually made with an outer refractory layer and an inner metal liner. The outer refractory layers (usually three) aid heat distribution, and the inner metal liner conducts heat from the firebox. This type of fireplace can also be made with copper, brick, marble, slate, and other materials for aesthetics. History Cast-iron fireplaces were used in the first few centuries of the common era. The typical modern fireplace, with a flue to exhaust the hot flue gases, was not in common use until the middle of the 19th century. Sites of the natural world 3da54e8ca3
