1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to heat-transfer systems and, in particular, to a heat-transfer system which includes a thermally activated thermal switch for interrupting the flow of a fluid to a heating element in the event of a fault in the supply of the fluid.
2. Description of the Background In the operation of a heat-transfer system, the loss of the fluid medium which is transferred from a fluid source to a heat-exchanger, such as a wall or radiator, is frequently the result of fault in the system, such as the insulation about the heat-exchanger having deteriorated or, for example, a leakage from the wall of the system. Should a leakage occur, the water can enter the wall and block both the drain and the return of the fluid so as to cause a continuous flow of fluid from the source to the heat-exchanger. This condition can only be corrected by shutting down the flow of fluid to the heat-exchanger. With a typical flow of fluid in a home heating system of approximately 5 gallons/hour, it can take up to several hours to shut down the flow of fluid. When this occurs in a home during cold weather, a homeowner may have great difficulty with which to contend. Attempts have been made to solve this problem in the prior art. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 4,643,469 to Dickson et al. discloses a system for interrupting the flow of a fluid to a heat-exchanger in response to a fault in the fluid supply or delivery, such as a leakage from the supply or a blockage in the fluid flow path. The system disclosed in the Dickson et al. '469 patent is intended to be used in a closed loop system with a flow of fluid of approximately 5 gallons/hour. In the system of the Dickson et al. '469 patent, a thermally sensitive component is added into the flow of the fluid in the fluid flow path. A short circuit in the fluid flow path causes the thermally sensitive component to absorb heat from the heat-exchanger so as to generate heat which is absorbed by the fluid. In Dickson et al. '469 patent, the thermally sensitive component is disposed in a fluid flow path between the fluid source and the heat-exchanger. The thermally sensitive component is either a thermally conduct
