A new survey from Howard University's Trademark Law Clinic says the Trump administration is completely wiping out Title IX protections for students, women, and anyone who the administration perceives as a "non-traditional" sexual partner. Title IX is a federal law that prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex in college and college athletic programs. Administrators at colleges or universities that receive federal funding must abide by the law, but the Trump administration is looking to weaken it. In the latest news from the Trademark Law Clinic, the Washington Post reports that the administration has issued new guidelines that eliminate the law's ban on "quid pro quo" sexual relationships on campus, removing the one certain way for students to be protected against sexual harassment. Last year, the department of Education issued its first set of updated rules under Title IX, threatening to revoke federal funding from schools that aren't transparent about sexual harassment and assault cases. But the move didn't go far enough for the administration, which has since been pushing for the rules to be repealed. The Trademark Law Clinic notes in its summary of the new report, "The Administration's latest Title IX Statement of Enforcement Policy [...] ignores more than a decade of settled law and effectively brings to an end the protections against sexual harassment set forth by Title IX. It breaks new ground in lowering the barrier to reporting sexual misconduct and in implementing an outdated and inappropriate 'he said, she said'."
