Edison himself was described by a teacher as being ugly and ugly-minded. At school, he was a crude braggart and a habitual truant; his truant behavior would lead to his father's imprisonment for debt. At home, his mother tried to teach him to read, but he could not learn to spell. When he was ten, his father died, his mother remarried, and Edison was sent away to live with a sister. He gained little support from her and few friends. Almost penniless, Edison traveled by stage to Cooper Institute in New York City, where he was soon apprenticed to a watchmaker named Ira Remsen. Later, he worked as a telegraph operator while continuing to go to school during the day. In 1873, he attended night school and graduated from the prestigious Western Union Telegraph Institute. One of his instructors thought highly of him, wrote that he was "a sharp mind, [and] has a good deal of showmanship" and "really seems to be in earnest in his work" -- and the opinion was unanimous. He was promoted to chief of the Union's telegraph school, which he "inherited" on his father's death. Over the next few years, Edison led a charmed life. He married a beautiful young woman named Mary Roberts, who was known as a quiet, cheerful, but unhappy, woman and who bitterly blamed her husband for their union. He supported his young wife and her mother by selling patent medicines. Edison already had a special interest in electricity, and he was encouraged by his friends, who wanted to help him get a job. General Electric was near bankruptcy and desperately looking for a leader. In 1881, the firm hired Edison, paying only a small salary and promising to be as liberal as it could be with the founder's child.
